New Poetry by J. Scott Price

Captain Who?

That gut-black October night, a security patrol set out:
a platoon of Afghans
and two of us. They, cloaked in toughness; we,
in mountains of gear, humped an unseen base plate of irony that chuckled, unheard.

Since the first tribes found common ground with naming a common foe and Allies first align side-by-side, the dog sniff test begins— the unuttered, unmetered tango that discretely discerns the order on the Totem of Men.

Let's see what they can do, the closemouthed metronome for the mission first cadence thrummed on the drums-of-tough. Respect doled only to those standing when the pounding is complete.

Our security objective below, the key terrain far too far above, we must sweep the elevated ridgeline for threats.

Afghan comrades lead us up

and up

and up

that mountain until we could take no more. Wheezing far from the top, we stop, defeated, conceding victory in this unavowed war.

They smirked in the dark, unseen. We, it seemed, were merely piles of panted breath, exhaling vanquished pride.

At this critical point of concession, something suspicious up ahead in the dark.

Few mutual words to discern the threat, only frantic mimicry of Charades-Gone-Bad to help:

but we all agree,

my NODs are needed now.

Leaning forward to green-light detect, I find no threat. But with strained abdominals abused and glutes pulling up the rear too loose we are all ambushed by the unexpected— a jarring, yet-almost-polite, puny poof.

Not a valley rumbling show of force that loosens all inside but a dry, mundane-almost-nothingness that takes the Afghans by surprise. The Lion of Ghazni they dubbed one of my friends in awe of his courage and his heart, and I secured my place on their Totem
as the anointed
Captain Fart.

B Hut

"Brand Vision: Making the best air conditioner in the world.

Brand Mission: Making life better."

Chigo Air Conditioning Co., LTD

Chigo heats, Chigo cools with labored breath that soothes ambient air despite never taming the beastly space inside the plywood shell where 12 guys retreat from the daily 15 hour duties that composes their yearlong song with just one more mundane or horrifying measure.

There are melodies of boredom and harmonies of fear and it serenades to unrestful-sleep the 12 guys crammed into their plywood shell, smaller than a suburbanite's play room.

There's plenty of opportunity to partake in olfactory unease, and plenty of opportunity to never really be at ease.

Stacked high and hard against the walls, poncho liner privacy offers only illusions of solitude and enough space to retreat into that illusion just to be somewhere else during sleep.

Steadfast Chigo, their toolbox-sized comrade high on the wall remains unnoticed unless deemed malingering.
Chigo will usually be abandoned, unthought-of when the song is done.

But one fated Chigo has a terminal task to perform, never envisioned during engineering, nor tested during production, for aimed with a rock and Allah's will, released with a wind up clock, a discarded Soviet rocket rains through plywood and Chigo braces, unmoved to shear off a detonator that would have ended the song in cacophony instead of a story that begins,

"You ain't gonna believe this shit..."