New Poetry from D.A. Gray: "Mosul Reflections," "St. Martin in the City," "The Rearview Has Two Faces"

STOMACH OF A COUNTRY / image by Amalie Flynn Mosul Reflections

Ten years and the place is not the same. Memory of green hills in a dry land, cratered by what fell from the sky. I don't know whether to trust the image on the screen or the one in my mind.

One I only knew as Sayyd gave well water, sweet tea and mince meat on laffa. We were tired from the spring rains, three days in the stomach of the country, we sank into the hard wooden benches and we ate.

I thought of Jonah, not wanting to travel here, and when he did, enraged at an apocalypse that never came how he rested under a bush then watched it die.

The father of the family smiled as I ate — both of us, with time, smiling.

Dost thou well to be angry?

His child in the corner never took her eyes off me. Her mother would glance over, expressionless, as if waiting for something that never happened.

Rain fell like mortars, knocking the edges from the dirt roads, craters in the middle. In a few minutes it would take us with it, descending. We'd see the fragments, some carved reliefs; we'd wondered what we'd destroyed, what we'd left the world – an image of broken rock in need of a makeshift savior.

St. Martin in the City

Hunger sometimes reaches up grabs your cloak while you're riding. You can't shield your eyes, or go into hiding. Every treasure you've carried home, is never enough. A beggar beside the road, lifts his head; loose skin and sullen, he shivers and so do you. * * * The day before we shipped I was walking with Preacher into the Walgreens for cold medicine and we saw a man asking for change. 'Pity it couldn't be him,' Preacher said, not waiting while I fished for coins. Since returning the eyes of every refugee leap out of every face. * * * The stuff of nightmares. Suffering you thought you knew. Sometimes it happens, a hand reaches out and causes you to draw back – until you see your fear in their eyes both surprised how easily the veil between you parts.

The Rearview Has Two Faces

Your memory has two faces. The thought occurs as you adjust your mirror in the chapel parking lot.

The eulogy's done its job, a few tears from even the most stoic, stone-faced ground pounders, the cracks in the First Sergeant's voice as he belts 'Smithson,' once, twice and again — as he waits for a response that never comes.

If you believe the wordshe defended the abstraction of freedom with every fiber, never showed late, said his prayers, and flossed. You remember an emails he sent. 'When I get back, there's a lineman job in Oklahoma. And the houses are cheap.' Days before he did it.

You remember the night

on your property, shooting empties off fence posts.
'I'm not going back,' he said. And you knew he would.
Frustrating as hell but reliable. And you'd rather have sincere doubt than cocksure and careless.

The sun from the East burns the side of your face through the driver's side window. In the rearview you can see your left side turning red.

Yeah.

The night he told you, you didn't sleep, agonized over what to do about what he hadn't done yet. And when he showed that morning, early, two full duffel bags and a goofy grin, you chided yourself for doubting.

You look one more time. Sometimes he's there sitting in the back seat, an afterimage lingering after the flash has burned, you still trying to regain your vision.
