

New Poetry by J.S. Alexander: “Sabat”

AWAY HE STAYS / image by Amalie Flynn

Sabat (Loyalty)

Dead bodies stop looking like bodies after a certain point.

The face, like a popped milar balloon with all the air blown out the top, the legs, oddly angled, their bottoms looking for all the world like tubes of children's toothpaste unevenly squeezed.

No, the dead here never arrive in an orderly manner, like in the movies.

This is Afghanistan, so they show up carried in blankets or what's left of clothes, bandages waving like May flags.

But they all go out the same way.

The mullah works systematically, washing and praying, singsong in his labors.

Next to him, a step back Mortaza watches them prepare his brother for the next life.

Mohammad Gul was the pride of Ismail Khel.

Young, handsome, brave. Funny.
Everyone said he was funny.

You don't hear that much in Afghanistan, someone being funny. As they lift what's left into the particle board box that looks like an Ikea desk repurposed hands seek to guide Mortaza out. But he pulls away, he stays.

He watches as they wrap Gul's head in cotton and prop it up on pillows of cheap foam. They spray him with Turkish perfume from the bazaar, and then drape the Afghan flag and the prayer rug over his box, taping it down with rolls of scotch tape. Mortaza sniffs back a tear, both for his brother and the debt he knows he'll now have to pay. He's not scared, just tired, and knows that somewhere, out in Lakan, is a man he's never met but will kill, as the way demands.

When we walk out, together, my boots slip, squeaking and squishing on the sodden, dirty tile.