

About

Established by combat veterans and maintained by a diverse board of veterans, military spouses, and writers compelled by themes of social justice and human resilience, The Wrath-Bearing Tree publishes essays, reviews, fiction, and poetry on military, economic, and social violence written by those who have experienced military, economic, and social violence or their consequences.

Our overall goals:

1. Continue to publish our monthly online journal on the first Monday of every month (10 years now!)
2. Pay our hardworking contributors for their work.
3. Establish a literary press for the kind of out-there and challenging writing WBT loves.
4. Create writing competitions for writers from communities affected by violence and histories of trauma.
5. Organize readings and workshops for communities affected by violence and histories of trauma

All in all, we use art to work towards the enhancement of public perception of social justice and human resilience in the context of all communities affected by violence and histories of trauma.

We hope you can support our mission.
