

New Poems by Alex Pitre

Slurry

The bones had been surrounded by years of suppression, political amnesia, and walls of loam that contained not much more than clay. Now laid out in some large building on the edge of some town, these amalgamated bones or the unidentified relatives of them know the name. The smell fills up to the rafters and a summer breeze or none at all passes through picking up new weight.

If each bone could be perfectly matched with the density of air, D could just place it in the current. Thoracic cage. Mandible. Radius. This equated metatarsal could remain or leave without genocides or policies guiding the way home.

The smell wrapped around each hair follicle follows D home into the tile shower. Maja absorbs it. It stings as it goes, carrying gravity, leaving impressions on pillows. The air wilts as it passes:

the difficulty of finding the definition of a word when its absence creates the shape of its meaning.

Nettle

Iron legs reach, sinuous and long, to the floor. Down to the floor. So down, below a bed under the floor and above the room.
Upside, inside, 'round and 'round.
The smell of iron fills my nose, fermented nettle leaves.
I live in the smell of it all.

I'll take it. All of you. I'll braid my fingers through your long eyelashes. Shake your head and let your leaves drift down, savoring every second below the winter moon rising. So round.
We've stayed here in this room with our roots deep in the soil. The sun to light our room, the walls. If you would have ever asked about all that I had wanted. The year turning around.

On the beams that hold up your knees I left you such long messages. Can I write upside if I am below?
And then the sun, it leaves.

I still see your face between the leaves casting shadows on the dirt brown wall of our room.
Upside, inside, you've tried to hide below.
So silly. Below is my hiding spot. All the things I have hidden under my roots long for that humus and detritus to surround each layer of skin. 'round and 'round.

Lying with my chin upward, your leaves tickle my cheeks. Lean long iron legs burying into our room.
For all of our seconds, I'll remain below.

You know what's down here, below with me. We've turned around, spiraling. Twisting all our leaves and our leaves.
You left me all the room again, but your arms they are so long.

Below, when I saw you there, I wondered how long round pupils would last in this room.
All our seconds spent tumbled in leaves.