New Poetry by Ben Weakley: "In Some Distant Country" and "How Will You Answer"

STRAW-BLONDE HAIR / image by Amalie Flynn

In Some Distant Country

We have seen this before, in books and on the screen, like dust plumes rising in some distant country. Except, some distant country is Michigan — armed patriots (terrorists) in the marble halls of a statehouse. Long guns and body armor. Stars and bars on the flags they carry and nooses for the nervous traitors (lawmakers) who can read the signs on the lawn outside — TYRANTS GET THE ROPE.

Now they are here, inside
the United States Capitol Building, these armed patriots (terrorists) smearing their urine and their fecal matter on the floor and the walls, roaming the halls with zip ties and body armor, looking for traitors (lawmakers)
to bind, to carry outside, where the gallows wait.

Their work is not finished.

Tomorrow, these armed patriots (terrorists)
will return to their homes, victorious, triumphant. They will return to towns across the fifty states where they work at hospitals and gas stations, at schools and police stations. They will smile when they greet us in the grocery store while they do their shopping.

They will tell us to unite.
They will tell us to listen and be calm, that time
will grant amnesty (without repentance).
They want us to forget, but
their work is not finished.

Who will tell us how to love our neighbors now?

Who can show us how to rescue our would-be executioners from the gallows they built?

How Will You Answer

What is the word for home after houses become bombs as they did in Bagubah and Mosul?

One afternoon your wife has you drill pilot holes to hang a flat screen-tv on the brick wall.
The mortar dust and shards of clay erupt from the spinning bit like bone ejected from kneecap and skull in the Baghdad torture rooms.

At night, you put your son into bed and draw the blankets up over his freckled shoulders. You stroke his straw-blonde hair and wonder, what is the word for son, now?

What can you call your son now that you've seen another man's son burning?

How will you answer when your son calls you father in the world you turned into ash and bone?